The Hot Seat

Tori Sparks

This US singer and guitarist has now turned her hand to flamenco fusion. By Jordi Bianciotto

Why is it that you've lived in so many different places? North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Nashville, Paris...

It was because of my parents' works, for my studies. It's interesting. Here they say to me, 'For you Americans, if you haven't left your home town, it's because things haven't gone well for you, you don't have any ambition; in contrast, if we have had to leave, it's because we've done something badly.'

Your music has a very American basis to it.

On October 16, I released my new disc, El Mar (The Sea), where I mix my original sounds with flamenco fusion, working with members of the group Calamento and the singer-songwriter El Duende. This is my fifth album and it didn't make any sense to make the record that I would have in Nashville. I kept asking the Calamento guys, 'Does this sound stupid? If it does, tell me now!' It's got some of my own songs and some covers, one from Roy Orbison and a Leonard Cohen one, 'Everybody knows', in a version for tango.

Do you know Omega by Enrique Morente and Lagartija Nick?

Yes, it influenced me in the sense that Morente did something totally unexpected in making that record. Attitudes like that inspire me, like those of Tom Waits or Ry Cooder. Flamenco has certain technical difficulties. Did you ever wish you'd not started with it?

I'm not trying to be a flamenca; I studied the guitar a bit in Granada, and what I'm doing is a mixture of lots of different styles: blues, country, jazz, folk, rock. For me, flamenco is the most complicated style – it's got so many nuances. What is strange to me is seeing someone who's a fan without understanding your lyrics. I'm grateful, of course, but it's a new perspective for me. It shows that the music itself also transmits meaning.

We follow the steps of 20th-century
art geniuses
in Barcelona

DALÍ

Barcelona was one of the most important stages in the spectacle that was Salvador Dalí's life. To coincide with the 25th anniversary of his death, we look at places where the surrealist genius left his mark. By Ricard Mas

The first stop on the Dalí trail is the Ateneu Barcelonès (Canuda, 6). In the 1920s it was the heart of the city's intellectual life. Dalí's uncle was a member, as was his art dealer, Josep Dalmau, and the most distinguished Catalan literary figures of the era, including Josep M. de Sagarra, Francesc Pujols and Josep Pla. Dalí was a frequent visitor and a rising star.

In March 1930, anointed by the founder of surrealism, André Breton, he spoke there on 'The moral position of surrealism'.

Dalí had become an atheist, a communist and a surrealist. He spent the Civil War in France, and, at the start of WWII, emigrated to the USA, to return in 1948 with an enormous moustache, a bestselling biography and a restored Catholic faith.

On October 19, 1950, Dalí returned to the Ateneu and gave the no less startling lecture, 'Why I was sacrilegious. Why I am a mystic'. But despite appearances, he hadn't changed much. And he still loved the work of Antoni Gaudí. He'd been one of the first to defend it to the surrealists, saying that 'beauty will be edible, or it will cease to be'. He translated Francesc Pujols' The artistic and Religious Vision of Gaudí (1927), into French. He was photographed by Català Roca on the roof terrace of La Pedrera – he had already sent Man Ray to shoot the building in 1933, to illustrate an article in the surrealist journal Minotaure – and at Park Güell. In Gaudí's park, in September 1956, Dalí held a celebrated lecture/performance: while painting on a huge canvas with tar, and with the castellers Xiquets de Valls raising human towers in the background, Dalí held forth on Gaudí, the gothic, Fortuny, Pujols, his wife Gala and the Sagrada Família.

From spirituality to the world of animals, in 1967 Dalí designed an ashtray for Air India, and asked to be paid one elephant. The authorities delivered the young elephant to Portlligat: Dalí named it Surus and donated it to the Barcelona Zoo. It was a year since the zoologist Sabater Pi had brought back Snowflake, the albino gorilla that would capture Dalí's imagination. Accompanied by the artist Amanda Lear, he was photographed with the gorilla, rivalling Duchamp and his Bride Stripped Bare by Her Bachelors, Even. But ultimately Dalí preferred dead animals, like those served at Via Veneto (Ganduxer, 10-12) where he always sat at table 8. Or stuffed ones, like the rhino he was lent by the much-missed taxidermist's on Plaça Reial – no a seafood restaurant – on which he posed for a famous photo session. Dalí was a regular visitor to nearby bar Los Tarantos; more than the music, he liked the flamenco party atmosphere.

To round off our Dalian tour of Barcelona, what could be better than a night at the Palace Barcelona hotel – formerly the Ritz – in the Dalí suite, where he entertained all kinds of visitors, including a horse, first alive and then stuffed, and the Czech contortionists The Elver Sisters.

Dalí was his own greatest artwork. But if you're more traditionally minded, it's paintings you want to see. Start at the Palauet Albéniz, with the commission Dalí painted for Mayor Josep Maria de Porcioles: in 1969 it cost 3 million pesetas. A mural in oils, it shows the traditional Catalan dance, the sardana, and simultaneously commemorates the first manned moon landing and the naming of future king Juan Carlos as Franco's heir. Also on Montjuïc, at the MNAC, you'll find three oil paintings, including a 1925 portrait of the artist's father, his hand resting indiscreetly on his fly. End the tour on the ground floor of the Reial Cercle Artístic, where you can view art collector Joan Bofill's controversial exhibition of sculptures. Why the controversy? That's another story.

BARCELONA'S ARTISTS

TÀPIES

We'll never unravel the meaning of Antoni Tàpies's labyrinth. We have to forget what we've learned to comprehend the wide-open universe of his spirituality. By Ricard Mas

01. Zoom, 1946.

Fundació Antoni Tàpies

In 1946 Antoni Tàpies quit law school and set up his first studio. In Zoom this self-taught artist hones a naïve vision similar to the art of the mentally ill. Imprints of the artist's hands are held out as if in prayer, and there's a halo around the inverted face. Primitivism and spirituality, earth and sky.

02. Metallic door and violin, 1956.

Fundació Antoni Tàpies

In the midst of his revolutionary discovery of pintura matèrica (matter painting), Tàpies retained the musical sensibility of his father, an atheist and a Wagnerian. The visual poetry of this piece combines the search for 'poor' materials that have nothing to do with the world of art, found objects that enter into dialogue – in the manner of the ‘mystical conversations’ before the Counter Reformation – with the imaginary symphony suggested by a metal shutter and the sound of a violin. The painted cross is a wink that defines the tonal key of the composition.

03. Rinzen, 1992-1998.

Given its intimate subject matter, the size of this installation is a surprise. It was created for the 65th Venice Biennale, and a second version was made for the MACBA. It speaks of illness and death, the driving forces of the investigation that the young Antoni Tàpies began during the time he spent convalescing from lung illness as a teen, and which he would return to with particular fervour in his late works. The artist, trapped in the same room in which we all are born, live, experience pleasure and die. The bed is the intermediate space between earth and sky, between reality and dreams, the great waiting room that gives shape to the human comedy.

04. Ochre painting, 1959.

MACBA

In 1950, Tàpies travelled to Paris on a scholarship. There he decided to make the leap into matter painting. The decade would be a whirlwind of discoveries and artistic insights in which the Tàpies we know today took shape. Inspired by informalism, he began to experiment with a new poetry of humble things. He chose a very limited range of colours: his favourite recalled the brown of a Franciscan monk’s habit. Instead of looking up to the sky, Tàpies’s spirituality looks down at the ground.

05. Sock, 1991-201.

Fundació Antoni Tàpies

Tàpies made few ‘public sculptures’.

Sock was first conceived when the MNAC commissioned a sculpture for its great oval hall. But the ensuing public outcry meant the planned 18-metre-high structure came to nothing. In 2010, the Tàpies Foundation decided to re-open its premises with a 2.85-metre version of this work that exalts ordinariness and simplicity. Turning it into a sculpture invites us to reflect on the mobility of the ways a higher presence can manifest itself in the material world, but also reminds us of the artist’s own struggles with mobility, as, in his old age, he discovered that physical decay is part of our inexorable fate.

MUSEU PICASSO - HERNANDEZ

PICASSO

The Picasso Museum, who turned fifty last year, was the first museum dedicated to the artist while he was alive.

By Braden Phillips

It's hard to imagine that creative giants like Pablo Picasso had formative years. Where did the teenage Picasso study? What did he paint? Did his work show signs of what was to come? The answers to those questions can be found at Barcelona's Picasso Museum in C/ Montcada.

Picasso moved to Barcelona's La Ribera neighbourhood with his family in 1895, at the age of 14, and after intervals spent in Madrid and Paris, he left the Catalan capital definitively for Paris when he was 23. During those years, he attended the La Llotja art school, rented his first studios (not far from where the museum stands now) and found a home among the Catalan avant-garde, frequenting the Quatre Gats tavern which served as the nerve centre at the time and where he held his first solo exhibition.

Established in 1963, the museum – which celebrated its 50th anniversary last year – is the first Picasso museum to be opened in the world while the artist was still alive, proving the depth of his connection with Barcelona and its influence on his work.

The museum owed its birth to the friendship and shared vision between Picasso and Jaume Sabartés. A Barcelona native who met the artist in 1899, Sabartés later became Picasso's personal secretary in Paris. In consultation with the painter, Sabartés laid the foundation of the museum by donating his personal collection of 574 mostly early Picassos, to which the Barcelona

Tales of the metro

A new walking tour explores subterranean Barcelona, to mark the 90th anniversary of the city's first metro line. Maria Junyent goes underground.

On 30 November 1924, Barcelona's metro was inaugurated, with a service connecting Plaça Catalunya to Lesseps, the first two stations built. Later came Fontana and Liceu, and Ferran, now out of service. In the '30s only 10 percent of transport users chose the metro; the other 90 percent preferred to stay in the daylight, on the trams.

Today, 90 years on, the metro system has 102.6 km of track and 141 stations, and carries around a million people a day. Manuel Marina is the guide behind BCN Subterrània: Històries del Metro, a walk designed in collaboration with tour company CultRuta and TMB, the city's main transport operator. Underground, he tells me, the city has woven a history parallel to events on the surface.

Rediscovering a public space

Marina's grandfather worked building Madrid's metro system, and told him stories of tunnel-building, as well as what he knew about Barcelona's metro – of civilians who died seeking shelter in Rocafort station during the Civil War, and the public showers at the entrance to Urquinaona in the '30s. When Marina later studied tourism, he realised that the story of the metro was also the story of the city. The Universal Exhibition of '29, the Civil War and the '92 Olympics left their mark underground as well as above. The city's hidden depths reflected artistic movements and technological change.

Marina wrote his thesis on the history of the metro, creating a route that would let visitors discover a part of the city that remains little known. Every Saturday he shares his stories with a group of up to 20 people. To join him, you can book a spot at reserva@cultruta.com (tour in Catalan).

Going underground

The tour starts at C/de'Estruc, 10, the offices of CultRuta. There, each participant gets an audioguide, via which Marina gives his unique history class. You'll discover 400-tonne bridges buried in what you thought was solid earth; find out what would happen if the city's groundwater weren't pumped systematically; learn why it's so hard to dig tunnels below sea level; and even learn the secrets of Banc and Gaudi, two stations that have never opened.

BCN Subterrània explores the metro every Sat at 10.30am.

Exhibition Visual testimony

JOHN STANNMEYER

The World Press Photo exhibition – organised by the Photographic Social Vision foundation – is a must-see for photography lovers, but also for anyone with an active interest in the world we live in. Now entering its 10th year, the exhibition has become a landmark event for visual culture and journalism in Barcelona, attracting thousands of visitors year after year. From 8 November you can see the 130 winning photographs of the prestigious international photojournalism award, which provide visual testimony of some of the most significant events on the world stage – this year the war in Syria, the death of Nelson Mandela, the conflict in the Ukraine, and the aftermath of the typhoon that devastated the Philippines. They also record ordinary lives in unfamiliar places, and capture natural phenomena that are part of the planet's life cycle, such as the movement of migratory birds or the family structures of Bonobos, one the two species of chimpanzee. It's an exhibition that takes a wide-ranging look at the reality that surrounds us all.

Jazz at all hours

Forget Chicago, forget New Orleans. This November, the world jazz capital is Barcelona. By Marta Salicrú and Maria Junyent

Our biggest year yet: that's how Tito Ramoneda, co-director of concert promoters The Project, defines the 46th Barcelona International Jazz Festival. And that's even after 2013's edition, which set new records for audiences, tickets sold and number of concerts given.

Until 29 November, the festival programme offers more than 100 events in over 30 venues around Barcelona, aiming to 'take jazz to every corner', from the Palau de la Música, L'Auditori, Luz de Gas and BARTS to Harlem Jazz Club and the Conservatori del Liceu. Some of the festival's top performers have already come and gone, including guitarist Vicente Amigo and influential sax player Wayne Shorter and his quartet, but there are still many attractions still to come.

Names to watch in November

The month gets off to a strong start on Tuesday the 4th with Chucho Valdés, a jazz legend and one of the festival's regulars. He plays L'Auditori, accompanied by the Afro-Cuban Messengers, to commemorate 40 years of Irakere, the band he co-founded in 1973, revolutionising the history of music – and not just in Cuba.

Thursday the 9th sees a concert by US singer-songwriter John Legend, one of the most exciting names in New Soul, who will be making his Barcelona debut after selling more than 7 million records around the world, and scooping an impressive number of awards, including nine Grammys.

From America we zip across to Italy with Paolo Conte, who pays his third visit to the festival after appearances in 2007 and 2011. The singer from Asti returns to BCN to present 'Snob', his latest album. But the musical journey is not over yet: next we travel back to the roots of experimental jazz with a duo formed by producer and multi-instrumentalist Moritz von Oswald and pianist Francesco Tristano, with their inimitable intertwining of classical and electronic influences and piano. And to round off the trip, the home-grown talents of Agustí Fernández, who performs at the Liceu Opera House on Saturday the 29th.

Exhibition Art & Language

SHOUTING MEN (DETALLE), D'ART & LANGUAGE

What or who was the Art & Language collective? What did they want? Find out in this exhibition at the MACBA.

Art & Language is a loose collective of artists that came together in the USA and the UK during the late '60s and early '70s. They were pioneers in the field of conceptual art, making words, conversations and discussion the basis of their work. Markedly political, they chose discourse as a critical and artistic medium, but one impervious to criticism and aesthetic phenomenology.

This exhibition addresses a movement that is fundamental in the history of contemporary art but whose intensity and sheer quantity is overwhelming, and whose visual aspect is almost irrelevant. To take one example, Air Conditioning Show (1966-1967) began as a text and a sketch. Later it was created for an exhibition in 1972. But the question followed, 'Is it necessary to install air conditioning as described in the text, or will the text do just as well?' In other words, isn't any concrete realisation of the idea merely a 'conservatively contemplative distraction'? This, however, is no impediment to the exhibition's including installations, images and even paintings.

Fries, chips or crisps?

Desperate for a well-fried potato? At Crum, the humble spud is a speciality. By Ricard Martín

How many times have you been served a great, or at least acceptable, meal, only for it to be ruined by a side of sub-standard chips? Or, worse, frozen ones – those soggy fingers of sunflower-oil-drenched starch? It won't happen at Crum. With quality-friendly potatoes as its slogan, the first bar in Barcelona to specialise in potatoes has opened on C/Parlament. The menu is straightforward: an A-side dedicated to tubers (five different potato dishes and five sauces, to mix and match) and a B-side of tapas and torrades, toast slices with different accompaniments.

'There's more science and variables involved in frying a potato than you'd think,' says Borja Casamitjana, one of Crum's three co-owners. 'You have to take into account the type of potato, the frying time, the way they're cut and the temperature.' Casamitjana knows his taters: he works for the family firm of potato distributors, and he and his business partners have been manning the fryers since 24 July. The source of the name is George Crum, reputedly the inventor of the crisp (or potato chip, for our American readers). The story goes that when a difficult customer complained his chips (or fries) were too thick, Crum sliced them paper-thin and fried them to a crisp, serving them with extra salt to annoy him even more. The customer loved them, and the rest is history.

FOTOS: MARIA DIAS

Crisps, chips, fries

After doing plenty of research, the team at Crum developed their five variations on the fried potato, including Noisy Crisps (Xips Sorolloses) – the crunchiest, which they claim to be true to Crum’s original invention – and classic fries. To ensure you stay for more than a snack, the menu includes cured meats and omelettes, as well a weekly potato dish, a chance to try Spanish and Catalan potato specialities like papas arrugadas, patata emmascarada, and patates d’Olot. There are also daily specials: smashed eggs with cured Iberian ham, or a baby garlic omelette, for example.

The worst thing that can happen to a chip – excess starch turning to simple sugars, which causes a burnt flavour – is something they avoid at all costs. Are Crum’s spuds Catalan? ‘We’d like to serve all-local food, but we have to follow the season, from May to September, from Málaga up to France.’ To serve the best possible potatoes in winter, they have to import them from Israel or Algeria, explains Casamitjana. And excess zeal can be counterproductive: they fry in olive oil, but it’s not extra virgin, which has too strong a taste.

Wine, films and xató

This November brings a great line-up of unique markets and festivals. By Xavier Amat

Wine on film

From 6 to 16 November, the Most Festival brings the best films and documentaries on the subject of wine and wine-making to the Penedès. The programme includes films by great directors that have never had a commercial release, and an interesting selection of short films. This year's crop includes gems such as the UK-produced Somm, directed by Jason Wise, and Natural Resistance, a French-Italian production directed by Jonathan Nossiter. This is the fourth edition of this festival that's gaining an international reputation. Alongside films you'll find a range of other activities related to wine tourism.

Rec.0 turns 10

A new retail concept. That's how the organisers of Rec.0 Experimental Stores like to define this twice-yearly event that takes place in the Rec district of Igualada, where former factories and tanning yards are temporarily transformed into pop-up fashion shops, with top labels selling overstocks. The festival is a big success: last year it saw 90,000 visitors, most of them from outside the Anoia region – and from the 5th to the 8th of this month, it will be celebrating its 10th year. If you're still not persuaded to make the trip out to Igualada, we should mention that as part of the Off Rec festival, some 200 restaurants and shops will be offering discounts, special gifts or miniature shows.

Gaudí's textile village

If none of the above activities grabs you, or the dates don't fit with your calendar, but you're determined to see something outside Barcelona this month, we suggest a trip to the Colònia Güell. It's not far out of town, in Santa Coloma de Cervellò (Baix Llobregat). The site will always be associated with Antoni Gaudí, even though his only contribution was the design of the church's crypt. Then again, the entire industrial and residential complex is Modernista in inspiration, extremely beautiful and well worth a visit.
